Zhejiang has, in recent years, experienced rapid growth, particularly in manufacturing which is focused on electromechanical industries, textiles, chemical industries, food and constructions materials; making it one of the most economically developed provinces in China.

The Zhejiang government has given priority to software development and the integrated circuit industry, promoting the development of "a digital Zhejiang". It also has the country's largest base of international crude oil processing, product oil export and fluorine chemical industry production.

In recent years, Zhejiang has followed its own development model, dubbed the "Zhejiang model", which is based on prioritising and encouraging entrepreneurship, with an emphasis on small businesses, large public investments into infrastructure, and the production of low cost goods in bulk for both domestic consumption and export.
